“ Although Ray was known as a kind soul, full of Scottish wit. I'd have to go back to one of my favorite Latin quotes from high school, "scientia potentia est," meaning "knowledge is power" to best describe him.
Once his body weakened and the cane was needed, his knowledge remained his power. He enjoyed so much sharing his experiences and knowledge with customers and coworkers. He taught me so much, miss the opportunity to pick his mind about best way to proceed on a design at work. This makes me sad.
Heartfelt condolences to his family. He loved to mention you in conversation, one could tell it was rooted in the love he had for you and the love he received back. Always brought a smile to his face no matter what he was going through.
May God Bless you all.

“ I've lived across the street from the Atwood's for 23 years, and they have been the best neighbors you could ask for. Ray was always quick to offer help or the tools to get the job done. Or talk about movies. Or just talk about life in general. I am so very sorry for your loss, Ray will certainly be missed

“ Mr. Atwood had an appointment for a surgical procedure. I had the opportunity to visit with James and just before I left Mrs. Atwood was scolding him for drinking liquor, telling him that he should eat better, exercise more, and take better care of himself in case anything happened to her. Without skipping a beat, he replied, "Well Mary, what if I go first?" I busted out laughing. It was unexpected to say the least. He smiled and continued, "You don't know what could happen tomorrow? The doctor can slip and cut my jugular and I could bleed out, then you would feel sorry for denying me the privilege of enjoying myself one last time before I died." The logic of this man was, and by faith I believe is, unconventional.

“ Ay Ray, I guess it will be a couple more years before we can debate again whether or not the moon landing was real.

“ To anyone who has ever heard one your stories, or even just a quick laugh at one of your witty remarks, that individual is now a better person for having shared that time with you. You will be deeply missed, Uncle Ray. May God bless your soul. We love you.
