“ I have many memories of Marilyn, at the Washington coast, baking Christmas cookies, but I think my favorite is when I took her to my favorite cabins on the Washington Coast for the first time and we went walking on the beach, which literally extended for several miles North and South. She was enchanted with the large flocks of shore birds that would suddenly take off, circle & come back only a few feet away from where they started, the amazing number of shells & sand dollars that we found and the waves. I had warned her about the waves sometimes coming in farther and faster than expected - sneaker waves - but she really didn't understand them until one came in. I saw one coming & told her she needed to move farther away from the waves ... she'd move a couple steps as I moved much farther, I told her again, & again she moved only a few steps. I had to grab her arm & pull her as the wave came dashing up to her feet, clearly surprising her as it covered her booted feet. It left us both laughing as we continued to enjoy our walk along the beach.

“ I asked my mother to teach me how to cross the street when we were very young (pre 1st grade) so that I could walk across and visit the girl with the red hair! We became friends that day and stayed that way for about 75 years. We knew each other's families and their foibles as well each other's quirks. My son and family moved to Seattle so whenever I visited there I got together with Marilyn. She enjoyed my son's family, especially my little granddaughters. Her life was never easy, she had more than her share of trauma and pain. But she was a fighter and refused to give up or accept injustices. She will be much missed and recalled as long as I live.

I will always cherish the week I spent with Marilyn , along with Carole, of course, at a cottage on Otsego Lake. We traveled all over northern Michigan, taking in all the wonderful sites and dining delights. Then returning back to the cottage for a quiet evening of conversation and reading. I miss her already and I'll always remember her as a strong woman who loved life and did not give in to her many health issues.
